By Leta Miller

Lou Harrison (1917-2003) was one of America's most celebrated composers. His music is known for its eclecticism, its use of non-Western instruments, and its exploration of social and political issues.

Harrison was born in Portland, Oregon, and grew up in California. He began studying music at an early age, and by the time he was in his early twenties, he was composing and performing his own music. In the 1940s, Harrison traveled to Asia, where he was exposed to the music of Java and Bali. This experience had a profound influence on his music, and he began to incorporate elements of gamelan music into his own compositions.

In the 1950s and 1960s, Harrison composed a number of operas, including The Marriage at the Eiffel Tower (1953), Rappaccini's Daughter (1964), and Young Caesar (1965). He also wrote a number of chamber pieces, including the String Quartet No. 1 (1950) and the Concerto for Violin and Percussion (1959). In the 1970s, Harrison began to experiment with electronic music. He composed a number of works for tape recording, including Suite for Microphones (1973) and Music for the Magnetic South (1975).

Harrison was a prolific composer, and his work encompasses a wide range of styles. He was a master of orchestration, and his music is often characterized by its rich textures and complex rhythms. Harrison was also a gifted melodist, and his music is full of memorable tunes. His music is often described as "eclectic," but it is always unified by his unique and personal voice.

Harrison was also a dedicated teacher. He taught at a number of colleges and universities, including the University of California, Berkeley, and the San Francisco Conservatory of Music. He was a mentor to many young composers, and his influence can be heard in the music of many of today's leading composers.

Lou Harrison was one of the most important American composers of the twentieth century. His music is a reflection of his own unique and personal journey, and it continues to inspire and challenge listeners today.
