The Return of the Classical Ideal

During the 18th century, the rediscovery of ancient Greek and Roman artifacts and literature ignited a growing admiration for classical aesthetics. Artists, seeking to emulate the perceived perfection of antiquity, incorporated classical motifs and forms into their works.

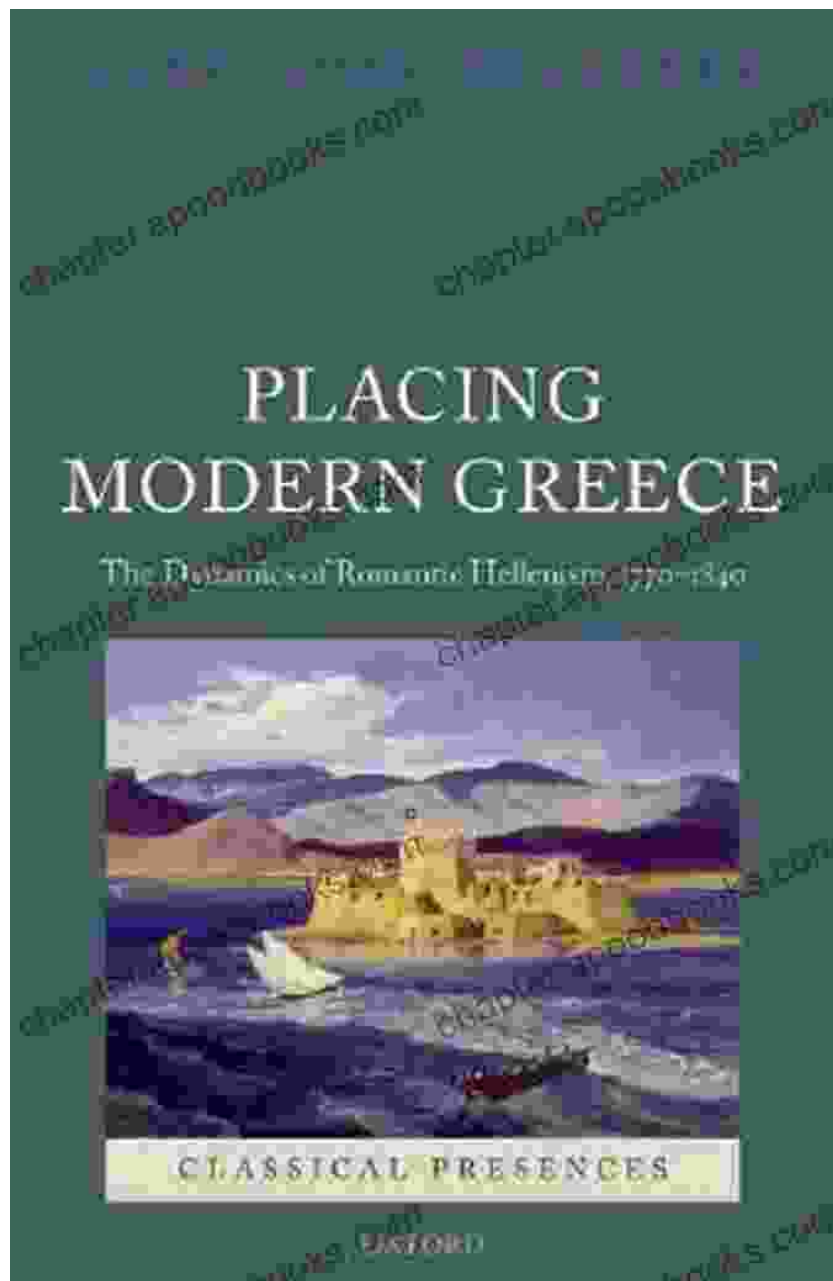

Neoclassical painters and sculptors found inspiration in the harmonious proportions and idealized figures of ancient Greece. Works like Jacques-

Louis David's "Death of Marat" and Antonio Canova's "Venus Victrix" exemplify the revival of classical form and subject matter.

Literature and the Romantic Sensibility

Romantic literature was heavily influenced by the themes and ideas of classical antiquity. Writers sought to capture the emotional intensity and imaginative flights of the ancient tragedians, while exploring the human condition through the lens of Greek mythology.

Poets like William Blake and Percy Bysshe Shelley incorporated classical imagery and motifs into their works, evoking a sense of grandeur and the timeless struggle between gods and mortals. Landscape painters such as J.M.W. Turner and Caspar David Friedrich found inspiration in the serene beauty of ancient ruins and the ruggedness of the Greek countryside.

Culture and Classical Revivals

The Romantic Hellenism extended beyond art and literature, influencing various aspects of culture. Architecture witnessed a revival of classical styles, with grandiose public buildings and private homes adorned with Doric columns and pediments.
